I really liked elements 4, but this beta let me see what elements 5 has to offer. I immediately noticed that it performs faster than 4. It's really amazing how good the preview is, I keep crashing Photoshop when I want to open a very large image like the Canon 5D Mark III 29MP 400D. And it's really fast. I was also amazed by the dramatically improved organization EXIF data, so I can go straight to the correct file when selecting a few images. I also liked the print quality improvements. I think Elements 5 is a great home-based photo editor, although a few photo editing companies like Adobe itself should be more careful about raising the price of their software because it's a good photo editor, in all honesty that's not the big issue. I have never worked with Photoshop CS3, so I have no experience working with it myself. It should be easy for the least technically inclined person to pick it up, though. One thing that did catch me off guard were the way buttons work with layers. To make a layer active, you set the color or the layer on the Layers palette. To move the layer, you click-and-drag it. Some people might find this confusing initially. Unlike the way a few months ago I learned Lightroom (which was similar) and Capture One, you can click and drag individual layers instantly anyway, with no dragging required. If you want to move a large group of layers, you can just select them all and drag them to a new location. It's intuitive but not intuitive. Yet Adobe will surely keep prioritizing this kind of functionality. After all, it's a lot more difficult for a cat-using photographer to learn that method than it is to learn lightroom or Aperture.
