"This debate over the future of the Redskins name has reached a tipping point." That was the statement of then-Sen. Tim Hutchinson, R-Ark., in 2010 in calling on the team to change its name. The debate didn't really erupt again after that, but it was the soundest thing to say to that point. If one's primary job is to earn the right to say it, then calling for a name change would have sent the message that the team's mascot, and the name of the franchise itself, shouldn't be rejected, even if it's offensive. The debate, however, has gotten revived recently, thanks to the football season and the league's playoffs. A few things have changed since 2010, some of which will be considered in this column: 1. Hutchinson is now retired. 2. The NFL has addressed name-change issues in the past. In 2012, the league ordered teams to change their names after a pair of lawsuits, one from the Native American Human Rights Commission and the other by the original Redskins owner, George Preston Marshall, who had since passed away. 3. The Redskins have been fined $100,000 for failing to comply with the 2012 order. In announcing the fine, the league said the team was "unable to provide proof of its compliance." A spokesman for the NFL declined to comment, saying the fine was posted on the league's website but that the league didn't comment on individual cases. "The Redskins' claim of non-compliance is premised on their position that the name 'Redskins' is 'a good-faith belief that the team's use of the name is neither disparaging nor derogatory,'" the league told the New
