The new version 3.7 (651.0202) version of Corel's software is pretty much the same. Nevertheless, it is not a bad upgrade. The name change itself is a little misleading as it is not even BETA as others have claimed. There are some user-interface changes, but the features are pretty much the same (twitter.com/Coreltown/status/1252948402003500673?lang=en , February 21, 2020) Some of the new features aren't even fully usable yet. If they will be in future updates, they'd better be expanded and made usable regularly. Some of the new features were supposed to be "future proof", but so far, they are fairly useless and not much different from previous versions of the app. Using Lightroom's Import dialog is your way to get your hands on images regardless of where they are and how they are available. Images can be uploaded from almost any source, including your phone, tablet, external SD card, scanner, or camera. Then just drag and drop them into the library to add the images. Even better, Lightroom's Import dialog is really smart and warns you if it thinks you might not get particularly well results — e.g., when the image format is incompatible with an image format that it is importing into. Once you're into the library, images can be organized in a variety of ways, including Smart Collections that automatically sort and then lets you keep new images intact, the most recently added to the top, etc. I personally like to organize collections by place and date, and then more broadly by type. For example, in one meeting, we worked on a school presentation, so I've collected that collection on video clips, retouching-related slides, and one-off slides about Photoshop technology such as Dj's, subjects of interest, etc. I also have a separate collection called Ugly dog pictures, because I've made that mistake before! (Hopefully with my dog, but still).
